The London property market is bouncing back as fewer people in the capital search for countryside homes and others who have left consider moving back, experts say.

More Londoners are now deciding to stay in the capital as staff are encouraged back into the office and the city's property market appears to regain its appeal to buyers.

Others who have moved out from London to the countryside say they have been unimpressed by the lack of things to do, poor local transport and nosy neighbours.

Some who have fled London for a rural area said they had made a 'terrible decision', while others who returned after leaving told how they 'feel like a weight has lifted'.

And one estate agent told MailOnline that some who moved from London to the Cotswolds during the pandemic are now getting back in touch with the firm again to 'move back to London as they either don't like the commute or find it too remote'.

Just under two years ago in August 2021, nearly half of London-based house-hunters were looking to leave the city, according to data from property website Rightmove.

But this proportion has now fallen significantly to the pre-pandemic average of about a third, based on hundreds of thousands of inquiries on its search platform.

Separate data from estate agent Hamptons found the percentage of Londoners looking for homes elsewhere in the UK is also now back at the pre-Covid average.

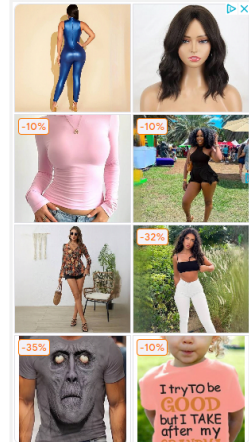

Further figures from Foxtons revealed the average number of buyer enquiries per month has risen by 41 per cent across the London market compared to last year, while the figure is as high as 153 per cent in Dulwich and 104 per cent in Hampstead.

Other areas to make the top ten include Ilford at 101 per cent; Kingston at 93 per cent; Stoke Newington at 89 per cent; Ealing at 87 per cent; London Bridge at 78 per cent; St John's Wood at 77 per cent; and Wapping and Putney both at 73 per cent.

The average home in London now costs £539,336, which is up 0.1 per cent annually according to data from Halifax. This is compared to £288,949 for a typical UK home.

Foxtons chief executive Guy Gittins told MailOnline: 'It's been an extremely positive start to the year for the London property market and we've already seen a notable increase in the number of buyers enquiring across all but a handful of areas.'

'This is despite the fact that mortgage rates are yet to come down and such a show of intent so early in the year only bodes well for the coming months as we head into what is traditionally the busiest time of year for market activity.'

And Tim Bannister, Rightmove's director of property data, told the Financial Times: 'We can see a resurgence in London back to pre-pandemic levels, and a general increase in the popularity of cities among buyers.'

Aneisha Beveridge, head of research at Hamptons, also told the FT that the 'return to the office trend' was likely to be contributing to London's increased popularity.

The onset of Covid-19 and lockdown measures in spring 2020 prompted a surge of Londoners leaving the capital for more space as millions of people began working from home.

Houses with large gardens and more space with room for home offices became extremely desirable as people fled urban areas.

But as companies continue to push for staff to come back into the office and the London entertainment and hospitality industries fully reopened, many people are now looking at making a return or

Why more people are considering moving back to London: What property experts say

Dariusz Karpowicz, director at Albion Financial Advice

'During the Covid-19 pandemic, there was a noticeable surge in remote working, which prompted many Londoners to seek homes in the countryside. However, as restrictions have lifted and companies have noticed the drawbacks of long-term remote working—such as impacts on team spirit and work attitudes—they're encouraging staff back to the office. This shift isn't entirely voluntary for many; rather, it's becoming a necessity for those wanting to remain integrated in their professional environments. Consequently, we're starting to see a trend where more people are considering moving back to London to be closer to work and the social and professional opportunities the capital offers.'

Gary Bush, financial adviser at MortgageShop.com

'The exodus from London property in 2024 started off well and then seems to have got bumped into touch by the upward swing on fixed rates again from March onwards. Our feeling is that people are still headed for the countryside but just not in such a rush, as caused by the pandemic.'

Posts on a Mumsnet thread have discussed the idea of whether life is better in London or the countryside, with some saying they would 'happily downsize and move back to a city'

Interested to find this thread! Glad you're happier OP - we moved out from London to somewhere very pretty and rural in the south west and it's a been a terrible decision (for me personally.) Left a house in an area we'd lived in happily for 8 years, for a lovely looking/larger one in a pretty looking rural village and ever since we moved I've struggled. Everything around us currently is either dogs, horses, landrovers or sport, and while I can make polite conversation etc to get on with people around us I feel utterly blank inside.

I think the root issue is we left because we thought we should, not because we wanted to, and didn't think hard enough about the realities because the pandemic made us panic about house prices. I grew up in the countryside and literally counted down the days until I could leg it at 18 - what was I thinking moving now!?

I feel like we've left it too late to go back, DS1 is coming up to secondary and I worry about uprooting them again. Also I think DH doesn't mind as much as me, so don't want to uproot everyone for purely selfish reasons. Instead trying to sell the house we're in now (great timing) to move into a smaller house in the bigger village nearby where we've have found people we do have something in common with (a lot of them city expats, weirdly.) and there is at least slightly more creativity/diversity, but also to free up some money to buy a flat in London for when the children are in uni. Hoping this will be enough hope to hang onto, but that will be 8-10 years from now.

The born and bred locals expect us to be really happy we swapped London for here, so unfortunately it's hard to find anyone to really talk to; obviously this is absolutely first world problems but VERY happy to have a cathartic moan here if anyone else wants to!

Hello. I was one of the people on this thread. Moved from London to Glasgow pre pandemic. We moved home to London earlier this year and we are so glad we did. We are all very happy and our daughter has settled into her new school well so far. She has yet to find her new best friend - early days- but I can see her independence and curiosity thriving being back in London. No regrets whatsoever. Feel like a weight has lifted. Hope that helps.

'However, as restrictions have lifted and companies have noticed the drawbacks of long-term remote working—such as impacts on team spirit and work attitudes—they're encouraging staff back to the office.'

'This shift isn't entirely voluntary for many:

I have observed more conversations with borrowers in the capital who are considering staying put and looking to renovate their homes. It will be interesting to see if this trend continues and how it impacts housing markets in both the capital and surrounding areas.'

Chris Barry, director at Thomas Legal

'We have an office in London and an office in the Cotswolds. Post Covid saw a huge spike in demand for clients wishing to move from London to the Cotswolds and many had only visited once previously before making the move. We are now seeing those same clients requesting our services to move back to London as they either don't like the commute or find it too remote. In addition we are finding younger people growing up in the countryside are still trying to buy their first home in the capital to be closer to big employers.'

It comes as a house price growth forecast from Savills was revised upwards today, based on an improved economic outlook.

Across Britain, property values are expected to have increased by just over a fifth (21.6 per cent) on average by the end of 2028, revised from a previous forecast of 17.9 per cent, the estate agent said.

2024, having risen an expected 3.0 per cent drop which was predicted by the company in early November 2023.

Savills cautioned that the market remains sensitive to short-term fluctuations in the cost of debt and political uncertainty in the run-up to the general election.

Housing transactions are forecast by Savills to reach 1.05 million in 2024, slightly up from the 1.01 million it predicted towards the end of last year.

Also today, an index from Halifax revealed the average UK house price rose by 0.1 per cent in April month-on-month, after a fall of 0.9 per cent in March, according to an index.

Halifax said that typical house prices in early 2024 have 'largely plateaued'. Property values grew by 1.1 per cent annually, accelerating from a 0.4 per cent rise recorded the previous month.

A typical UK home cost £288,949 in April, compared with £288,781 in March, Halifax said.

Amanda Bryden, head of mortgages, Halifax, said: 'While there is always much scrutiny of monthly price changes - and a degree of volatility is to be expected given current market conditions - the reality is that average house prices have largely plateaued in the early part of 2024.'

Savills' predictions for house price growth over the five years to 2028:

- North West, 28.8%
- Yorkshire and the Humber, 28.2%
- Wales, 26.4%
- Scotland, 25.8%
- North East, 25.2%
- West Midlands, 23.4%
- East Midlands, 22.8%
- South West, 18.7%
- South East, 18.2%
- East of England, 18.1%
- London, 14.2%
